A day along the Alaskan Russian River

By Ellen F. Gillon

It was truly a unique experience. Eight tents clustered before a treed area in front of a mountain range. Behind this rose a panorama of purple mountains. I was on a two week camping trip which included two nights in Denali National Park. It was late in July 1996 on the great Alaskan frontier. The trees were not large in diameter but were very tall indeed. From the campsite I faintly heard the sound of water coming from a nearby river-it beacons to me. On the ridge high above the river I noticed several clumps of moose droppings, but didn't see any moose. In the river below I observed large fish, even from that distance. I wondered what the moose had thought as he gazed over the same scene. Equipped with a soda and a book, I ventured forth.

I took the descending trail and heard splashing water, the disturbance getting louder as I neared the river. I was cautious as I didn't know who or what was causing the noise. Luckily the river was not too far, and I soon discovered a clear flowing river with a lot of undergrowth. With berry bushes along its banks, I saw no humans, so what had made the splashing noise? I soon discover it was the fish themselves in the shallow water "kicking up their heels" frolicking with glee, probably happy to be returning to their "homeland". I found a spot to rest with my book while absorbing the wonders of this Alaskan frontier. Several birds flittered in the nearby thicket, enjoying the river with me. It was very peaceful as I watched the fish swim by. I was reminded of my 5th grade Social Studies book. It had said the Indians stood with a spear at the river and chose a fish for dinner. With this river I could easily see how that could happen!

Feeling in tune with nature I scanned a few pages of my book. Two fishermen appeared from around the bend. I watched as they quietly stood in the stream wearing waders. It seems the count of fish numbers was down so regulations forbid the catching of the red salmon that week to let the fish spawn up river. Luckily campers were exempt, so the crowds who usually fill the parking lots were not there due to the restriction. Yea! We had the river to ourselves!

I arose and followed the meandering river and discovered even greater sounds of rushing water. I had arrived at the heart of some rapids, the river churning and the loud ruckus of the water making it difficult to converse with others who had gathered to watch the fish spawning. Across the middle of the river were about ten stationary logs, allowing those brave enough to catch a closer look at the activity around. The salmon were fascinating to watch, acrobatic in their jumps up the river. Some fish would stop in a calm side pool before trying to advance. It seemed to me they paused to gather up courage to blast out of the water and jump as far as they could to reach the next pool of water. If the fish missed his target he might flop back and be pulled in reverse by the current, losing ten to twenty feet in the process. The park rangers had built a fish ladder on the far side of the river, so some fish were able to progress more easily. I felt like cheering for the fish in the mainstream, doing it the old-fashioned way!

Time passed and the orb of the sun was disappearing so I decided to return to camp. Later there was an eerie brightness about me. When packing for this trip the first item I had included was a flashlight-- Little did I know I would never need it as daylight continued all through the night. I could read my book in my tent with no artificial light! But alas I was tired, and my day along the Russian River had come to an end. I closed my eyes and went to sleep a happy camper!
